HUNGRY?

Pale yellow-green foliage, or brown spots or borders on lilac leaves, appearing in midsummer, may mean your plant is suffering from malnutrition. When not attributable to physical injuries to the bark or roots, this malnutrition is due to poor soil. Feed compost in the early spring. If you have none,

FERTILIFE commercial compost, put out by the Chicago Stock Yards Compost Co., is recommended. Chemical fertilizers are not recommended, and it is easy to use too much of them and burn the plant roots, something a well rotted compost will never do. In early summer, mulch with grass clippings, hay or straw. This will rot down in time and add humus to the soil. DON'T use peat--it is too acid, nor sawdust mulch--it takes nitrogen away from the soil. If feeding and mulching does not solve the problem, send leaf samples to your own state department of agriculture for analysis.

L I L A C S F O R A M E R I C A : This book lists all known lilacs; their originators; date of introduction; type; color classification; and nurseries where they can probably be obtained. Also lists the "100 Best" in the opinion of lilac experts, and contains other information of interest on lilacs. You can obtain this publication from us; $1.00 postpaid.
